PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

The People's Choice Duly Inaugurated at Washington To-Day.

DISAPPOINTMENT IN THE WEATHER.

But the Official Programme for the Ceremonies Strictly Carried Out.

GREAT THRONGS IN THE SLUSHY STREETS.

Illuminations May Be Spoiled To-Night, but the Big Inauguration Ball Will Go On Brilliantly.

WASHINGTON, March 4.—The official act of inauguration is over. Grover Cleveland is for the second time President of the United States, and Benjamin Harrison retires, after four years in the highest office, to a simple citizenship.

Owing to the stormy weather and other causes, there was some slight delay in the earlier proceedings of the day. Nevertheless, the official programme was quite strictly carried out.

Contrary to expectations, Mr. Cleveland did not leave the Arlington for the White House until nearly 11 o'clock. A small crowd had collected in front of the private entrance, and had been standing there in the blinding snow-storm for more than an hour.

When Mr. Cleveland at last appeared he was accompanied by Senator Teller, of the Senatorial Committee.

As they stepped into a cab, which was waiting, the crowd gave a faint cheer, which Mr. Cleveland acknowledged with a smile.

The President-elect wore a black silk hat and a heavy overcoat buttoned up to the chin.

There were about twenty-five other carriages in waiting at the hotel entrance, and they were quickly filled up with the members of the Cleveland Cabinet, the National Democratic Committee, and the Executive Committee of Arrangements, numbering about sixty people in all.

Off to the White House.

The procession moved rapidly around the square to the west gate of the White House grounds. Mr. Cleveland's carriage drove at once to the entrance of the Executive Mansion, where he alighted and was received formally by Sergeant-at-Arms Valentine, of the Senate, acting as Master of Ceremonies.

Mr. Cleveland was conducted into the House. The other carriages remained in line. That containing Vice-President-elect Stevenson had just come up from the Ebbitt House. It was a four-horse landau, but the covering was up.

Mr. Stevenson's escort was Senator McPherson, another member of the Committee, while Senator Ransom, the third member, was in waiting on President Harrison.

The cab which brought Mr. Cleveland to the White House drove away and an open landau, drawn by President Harrison's four high-stepping bays, took its place in front of the entrance.

The President's coachman, William Wells, was in the driving seat, and he looked full of importance. Meanwhile, the military escort, which consisted of two brigades made up of infantry, cavalry, artillery and marines, had formed in line on Pennsylvania avenue, opposite the State, War and Navy Department Building, under the command of Col. Livingston.

The men were enveloped in heavy blue storm overcoats, the red-lined capes of which were turned back over their shoulders.

Cleveland and Harrison.

A few moments later Mr. Cleveland reappeared, this time arm in arm with President Harrison.

The President was attired in deep mourning, with black gloves and a wide mourning band around his silk hat. He looked very pale and careworn, appearing in strong contrast to the robust figure and ruddy countenance of Mr. Cleveland, who has never looked stronger or in better health than at the present time.

The line started from the White House shortly after the appointed hour, and was met at the gate by Grand Marshal Martin McMahon and his staff and special aides.

Behind the Presidential carriage came another four-horse landau in which were seated Vice-President-elect Stevenson and the members of the Senatorial Committee, while the other carriages followed in the same order in which they had left the Arlington.

Among the occupants were Major-General J. M. Schofield, Commanding the Army; Admiral Gherardi, Commanding the Navy; Chairman James G. Berrett, of the General Committee, and Chairman James L. Norris, of the Executive Committee on Inauguration Arrangements.

The Grand Marshal was preceded by the first detachment of the regular troops, with a squadron of cavalry at the head, while the Second Brigade fell into line behind the carriages, and in this order the Presidential parade moved down Pennsylvania avenue towards the Capitol.

It took some time for the First Brigade to pass by. The regulars made a splendid appearance.

The start for the Capitol.

It was just 12 o'clock when the head of the column started. As soon as the Presidential carriage passed out of the east gateway of the White House grounds the crowd which had centred about that point set up a cheer and shouted the names of both Cleveland and Harrison.

As the people swung their umbrellas and cheered, the two occupants of the Presidential carriage bowed and smiled right and left.

There was a big crowd of spectators on the Treasury Building, under the protection of the overhanging capitals, where a number of small stands had been erected.

The storm at this time had abated somewhat and changed to a fine, sifting sleet.

The ladies of the White House, including Mrs. McKee, Mrs. Russell Harrison and Mrs. Dimmick, were driven down to the Capitol as soon as the procession had got well on its way.

A number of ladies in the Cleveland party left the Arlington at the same time in carriages for the Capitol, where seats were provided for them in the Senate Chamber and on the steps of the Capitol, where Mr. Cleveland is to deliver his inaugural address.

In one of these carriages was Mrs. Cleveland, who was accompanied by Mrs. Lamont and Mrs. Bissell.

Other members of Mrs. Cleveland's party which went to the Capitol were Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Benedict, Mr. and Mrs. Freeman, and Richard Watson Gilmer and his daughter, Miss Gilmer.

After the procession had passed around the corner at the Treasury Building and entered the broad stretch of Pennsylvania avenue, Mr. Cleveland received a continued ovation.

As he passed the Willard Hotel, where a big crowd of Tammany men had collected, the braves cheered themselves hoarse.

Another large contingent of Wiswamutes had gathered near their headquarters at E street, a little further down, where there was more yelling and shouting.

It was about 11.45 when the President's carriage passed this point. At that time it had almost stopped snowing, and the air was growing colder. It looked as if Mr. Cleveland would not have to deliver his inaugural address in the storm, after all.

THE INAUGURAL PARADE.

A Stirring Display of Marching Men Despite the Weather.

WASHINGTON, March 4.—Disheartening as the weather situation was to all the thousands gathered here this morning, it was to no others more so than to the members of organizations booked to take part in the parade.
